

"Governments set budgetary policies within a complex system of dynamically interacting parts. The authors capture this complexity and the associated trade-offs required by studying the composition of budgets, not single budgetary categories. . . . A major leap in our understanding the connections between politics and budgetary outputs."

– Bryan D. Jones, University of Texas at Austin

"A fresh and insightful take on how governments use their public monies. The authors explore the trade-offs that are inherent to budgeting and examine the compositional nature of this formidable task. Methodologically sophisticated and empirically rich, this book advances our idea about what governments do and why they do it. A must read for comparativists and political economists."

– Christian Breunig, University of Konstanz

". . . the most penetrating modern political-science study of comparative democratic budgetary policy to date. Their empirics are thorough, careful, methodologically sophisticated – breaking new ground in showing proper handling of dynamic compositional data – and convincing. . . . Sets the new highest standard in the study of comparative democratic fiscal policy."

– Robert J. Franzese, Jr., The University of Michigan
